Businessmen, especially, were skeptical about these new-fangled proposals. The first proposals to correct the obvious mistakes of the past sometimes involved large expenditures but not very often did they promise a made-over city. They accepted far too much as inevitable. In the past forty years we have learned many lessons. We know now that we must learn something of the past history, the present position and the possible future trend before we can venture to propose suitable remedies. We know that we must have trained technicians to analyze the assembled information and propose sound remedies for the long-term future as well as for the immediate present. We know that in order to bring about desired changes, not now, perhaps, familiar to the public, we must have public understanding and support. We know now that planning is good business and many businessmen accept that fact. It is not in keeping with the American temper or history to balk at stupendous undertakings. It is only when the public is smothered by petty routine and uninspiring, but expensive, palliatives that it becomes lethargic. The American imagination is easily inspired to achievement on a grand scale. While the process of planning is dependent on technicians, the results...
