CHAPTER XL END OF THE PKEPARATION. --BEGINNING OF THE CAREER. Large interests keep the soul free; like the great ocean currents which interchange the climates of the globe, they balance the nature and modify all excess. --Anon. When the second semester began, Will elected her studies without consulting any one except Nell. She secretly hoped that Randolph would not be in the same classes, for then she would rarely see him, and that, she thought, would be a great relief. She decided to take history and analytical chemistry, and she kept on with Greek and Latin. When she went into Professor Roemers room to get the list of historical questions, the first one she saw was Pandolf, who had come for the same purpose. Why, of course, she thought, I might have known he would take history! And maybe, after all, it is a little cowardly for me to be unwilling to meet him in recitations. Nell took chemistry also, and they made themselves large aprons, and engaged tables at the laboratory side by side. The first morning, when they were arranging the bottles on the shelves and washing test-tubes, Will glanced across to the next row, and on a card above one of the tables she saw Randolphs name, which meant that he had engaged it for work. It was rather a coincidence that Randolph should have chosen practical chemistry too, and she was more amused than annoyed at the fact that their tables...
